Syn. Irr, Unfinnig, Sinnlos, Betrübt, Wahnsinnig, Wahnsinnig. Irr is used of one whose ideas, during a state of illness, are void of any inward connection among themselves. Unfinnig and Sinnlos indicate a deprivation of the use of the understanding and senses, occasioned by any violent passion; in the Unfinnigen, however, this privation begins with the understanding, whence it spreads its painful effects over the senses; with the Sinnlosen it at once stuns the senses, and thereby arrests the functions of the understanding. — Unfinnigkeit, Betrübnis, Wahnsinn und Wahnsinn differ from each other by their duration. Der Unfinnige finds himself in a transitory state, which vanishes with its short-lived cause, whereas the condition of the Wahnsinnigen and Wahnsinnigen is permanent. Der Betrünte is distinguished from both the latter in this, that he lives in a continual waking dream. Wahnsinn implies the entire bereavement of the use of the understanding, in which a man takes that to be really true which he merely imagines. Wahnsinn manifests itself by a profusion of ideas; but as they are unconnected and confused, they are often absurd. The Wahnsinnige is talkative, his ideas are extremely mutable; the Unfinnige will often continue quiet, and apparently void of thought.

Syn. Kalbau, Eingeweide, Obder, me, Uetrisfe, Kalbau (related to the Greek καλας) is used only of slaughtered animals and in culinary language; Eingeweide, on the contrary, is said likewise of men. The Roman caruspices inspected the Eingeweide, not the Kalbau, of the beasts sacrificed. Kalbau is nearly related to Obderme; for both signify the same parts of the animal body; the former, however, only in so far as they are prepared for food. Hence the Obderme of fish and birds are not called Kalbau, hant Obderme or Eingeweide. In scientific language Obderme is distinguished from Eingeweide and Obderme, as signifying properly only the mesentery or fatty wrinkled skin in the middle of the Obderme; whereas Eingeweide signifies all the inner parts of the animal body, and Obderme the canals containing the Obderme.

Syn. Kält, Großkält, Kälte, Groß. Kälte is the absence of heat in any degree; Groß only in a higher degree. We call a body kalt, when it has a less degree of warmth than our own body. Groß, however, is that degree of Kälte, which freezes water. Kälte, therefore, begins to be Groß at 32° Fahrenheit. If we judge of Kälte merely from sensation, we call it Groß when it causes contraction of the skin, shivering, &c., vid. Frierfroß. Figuratively we call any one kalt who is deficient in warmth of sentiment. Groß is that which excites no perceptibly agreeable feeling in others. A kälter man must necessarily be a frierger next; for he who is himself void of sentiment can excite none by his language in others; vid. tatjunnä.

Syn. K ö c h e n, S i e b e n. Köchen when used without any qualification has always reference to victuals. The mistress orders what is to be got, when she settles what dishes shall come to the table. Sieben signifies merely to heat by fire. We sieden salt, soap, &c.
Sieben implies a greater degree of heat than sieden. We say the water boils (siedet) when its surface is slightly agitated; it siedet when it heaves in bubbles and has attained the highest degree of heat.

Syn. I. Kraft, Vermögen, Stärke, Kraft actually produces the effect; Vermögen is capable of producing it. Kraft is active and operative, Vermögen can become so. Stärke is a determinate and more especially a higher degree of Kraft. Start is the opposite to schwach or weak, Stärke to Schwäche. A child even has a certain Kraft, otherwise it could do nothing; but it has as yet no Stärke.

Syn. II. Kräftlos, Unkräftig, Schwach. A thing is unkräftig when it fails to produce an effect, whatever may be the cause of the inefficiency; träftlos and schwach, when the cause is want of force (Kraft). Kräftlos and schwach are used as well with reference to living as to inanimate objects; unkräftig is said only of the latter. A thing may be träftig for any one and yet not be träftig. The träftigste speech will be träftig for one who does not attentively listen to it. The opposite to schwach is Rart, as having a higher degree of force. The Schwache has no great degree of strength, but the Rartste has none at all. Any whole is called schwach from the feebness of its parts and part from their multiplicity. The whole may, therefore, be schwach, though each single part is Rart. The army when composed of but few men is schwach, träftig when exhausted by long marches and fatigue.

Sam. Rache, See (ber), Pfuhl, Pfäke, Sumpf, Seich, Seibher. A See is not only the largest inland standing water, but it may also have an outlet, and consequently be connected with rivers. Its water is, moreover pure and is, for the most part, uninhabited by different kinds of fish. A Pfuhl is smaller than a See, and has no outlet; it is sometimes filled at certain times turbid, and may or may not contain fish. A Pfäke is a smaller Pfuhl, which may disappear as easily as it is formed. A Sumpf is distinguished from the two last by having its waters over a soft soil which gives way under the feet. He who is not sure of his way in traversing a wood may easily stick fast in Sümpfen. In some boggy districts the Sümpfe do not dry even in summer. Sümpfe is peculiar to Upper Germany; its signification is the same as Wüßel in Lower Germany. Zeich und Bezeich are distinguished from the rest as being artificial and destined as reservoirs for fish. Both, however, and especially the former, are often without fish and only serve as an embellishment to pleasure-grounds.

Syn. Lächerlich, Belachenswerth, Schamisch, Pösserlich, Burlesk. The Belachenswerth deserves to be laughed at, even if it should not always excite laughter. The Lächerlich is properly, what really provokes laughter; it is, however, often confounded with belachenswerth. The really Belachenswerth should be the only source of the Lächerlich, but poets by humorous combinations, and associations can often make things lächerlich which are not at all belachenswerth. The Lächerlich is the Lächerliche in action. Every thing lächerlich is therefore lächerlich, but every thing lächerlich is not lächerlich. The Pösserliche (ludicrous) is more especially the Lächerliche in gesture. The monkey on account of his lächerliche motions, is a pösserliches Thier (droll animal). Children, also, are pösserlich, when in their games they imitate the serious manner of older persons. The Burleske consists in a lächerliche representation of what is great and important. An ignorant man is called a reer Kopf, and not a *teig*er Kopf. So we also say teer promises or words, and not teig. An unmarried person is called teig, because no connexion exists, which hinders him from contracting marriage. In like manner any post that is vacant is called teig, a place or service teig. We say the throne is teig, teig.

Syn. II. Reer, Reiser, Reide. A place is teer from want of objects, teig, inasmuch as it cannot, on that account, be inhabited by man, and ree, when we find in it nothing that is useful or agreeable to him, more especially the absence of other human beings. Bottles, dishes, pots, boxes, &c. are teer, when there is nothing more in them; a country lies teig, when it is uninhabitable; the cell of a nun is neither teer nor teig, but its inmate may find it tee, when she seeks in vain for what alone could satisfy the yearnings of her heart.

Syn. I. Leichtfertigkeit, Leife, Muthwilligkeit, Verbißtheit. Those are leichtfertig who do not consider whether their pranks are hurtful to others or not. Leife are those who somewhat outstep the proper bounds, or do things in joke or from malicious pleasure which they, at least, do not think wrong or hurtful. We say a leifer, leichtfertiger boy, and the same also of a girl. Those are muthwillig who intend some injury by their freaks. Leichtfertigkeit is, therefore, a lesser fault than muthwilligkeit, although in common parlance the latter is almost used for the former and without any bad accessory idea. Great reproach is implied when we call a female leichtfertig; this, however, may originate merely from leichtsin. Verbißtheit is an epithet of still greater reproach.

Syn. II. Leichtsinnig, Flatterhaftigkeit. Leichtsinigkeit indicates the inability to receive sufficiently strong impressions from objects with respect to their causes; flatterhaftigkeit with regard to their effects. A leichtsinniger man stakes what is of most importance to him, and forgets directly the greatest losses, because, from want of attention, the most important things make no impression on him. An effect of this disposition is flatterhaftigkeit, or the rapidity with which a man hurries from one object of his choice to another.

Syn. Lieblich, Schmeicheln, Günstling. A Lieblich is preferred to all others and has the first place in the affections of the person by whom he is beloved: a Schmeicheln is the one most tenderly fostered and petted, often indeed more than is proper. Günstling is one to whom another extends his special favour or Günst. The Schmeicheln is always a Lieblich, but not inversely. The great and rich have their Günstlinge, who sometimes are their Lieblichen. The poor man has no Günstling, but he can have his Lieblich, though it may be only among animals. One is therefore the Günstling of a superior, and the superior has an inferior for his Günstling; one can, however, have a Lieblich among one's equals and even among one's superiors.

Wm. Mittel, 1869, Dertigung. Whatever is, or seems to be good for the attainment of any end is a Mittel; we call it a Weg when it consists in an action or actions. To get into an office by marriage is often the right Mittel, since it avails more than merit, but it is never the right Weg. A Dertigung is something artificially contrived for a particular use; Mittel whatever is used for any end. A good physician knows the best Mittel by which his art can cure diseases, and a clever surgeon is able to use with skill different surgical Dertigung.

Anything which is no evil in itself, but from which an evil to another may arise, conduces to his Nachtheit. When the evil consists in the deprivation of any good, it is a Verlust, and when it leads to the diminution of any good, it does him Abbruch. An aposteme in the foot is a Schaden, because it is an evil. It conduces to the Nachtheit of a tradesman when another establishes himself in the neighbourhood. He suffers Abbruch from it in so far as his gains are divided, and a Verlust, inasmuch as some of his customers leave him, which cannot but do Schaden to his business.
